

EDITORIAL FOREWORD

I am pleased to announce the release of the third issue of Volume 40 of the Arizona Journal of International & Comparative Law. Many thanks to all the members of the journal. This issue would not have been possible without their hard work, attention to detail, and professionalism.

This issue has two articles and three notes. Samuel Horowitz's article proposes a universal definition of terrorism that seeks to avoid the pitfalls of over- and under-inclusiveness that is inherent in current descriptions in national and international law. Vaughan Carter, Charlotte Ku, and Andrew P. Morriss's article explores the evolving sovereignty of former colonies of the Netherlands, France, and the United Kingdom, seeking lessons for Native American jurisdictions. Alexander Brookes's note compares the new Greenhouse Gas Reduction Fund in the United States with Australia's Clean Energy Finance Corporation to determine how government investment can best tackle the urgent problem of climate change. Tanner Giar's note offers a comparison of air passenger rights in the U.S. and Europe in hopes of finding a better balance between regulation, choice, and quality air travel. Finally, my own note—don't worry, it was picked by our selection committee and not me—compares and contrasts the origins, implementation, and results of day fines in Germany and Arizona in the hope of guide activists seeking to revive them in the United States.

Thank you for continued support of the Arizona Journal of International and Comparative Law. I hope you find this issue illuminating.
